四、閱讀測驗【請依照段落上下文意，選出最適當的答案】

Whether humans are born good or evil has been debated by philosophers for centuries. Aristotle argued that morality is learned, and that we are born as "amoral creatures" while Sigmund Freud considered new-borns a moral blank slate. Anyone who has read Lord of the Flies (蒼蠅王) will expect children to be complete sociopaths just waiting to be freed from their adult-imposed restrictions to brutally kill each other. Maybe the two most famous opposing views on this debate are those of Thomas Hobbes and Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Hobbes described humans as "nasty" and "brutish", needing society and rules to control their instincts in order to thrive; later Rousseau openly criticized him, arguing instead that humans would be gentle and pure without the corruption of greed and inequality caused by the class system imposed by our society.

However, developmental psychology studies show there may be some natural "good" in humanity (or, to be more technical, that at least kids are capable of passing moral judgements at an earlier age than previously thought). To do this, babies less than a year old were made to watch a puppet show where different colored shapes acted in ways that were clearly recognizable as morally right or wrong.

A red circle was shown struggling to climb a hill while an “evil” blue square tried to push it back down. Meanwhile, a “good” yellow triangle attempted to help the red circle by pushing it up. After the play, the babies were asked which shape they wanted to play with: the evil blue square or the good yellow triangle. As you may have guessed, they all picked the latter, the triangle that exhibited helpful and selfless behavior. This applied even for babies as young as seven months. The scene replicates the findings of a 2010 study which went further to prove that babies were choosing the puppets because of their actions rather than other variables (for example, a preference or familiarity with a certain color or shape). When the show was replayed with the shapes taking on the opposite role, the infants still mostly chose the shape that had taken on the role of the helper.

- 【3】 21. What is the passage mainly about?
① A popular puppet show ② A famous study conducted in 2010
③ Human nature ④ Two well-known philosophers
- 【2】 22. Which of the following is true?

② There is still no agreement among philosophers about the true nature of humanity.
③ Most philosophers believe that human nature are evil, while most psychologists believe the opposite.
④ The nature of humanity depends totally on the environment.
- 【4】 23. What can be inferred from the passage?
① Morality is something humans learn completely from adults.
② Some colors are better representations of good behaviors than others.
③ In the works of Sigmund Freud, children are described as evil-natured creatures.
④ Some babies may like certain shapes better than others.
- 【2】 24. Why does the author talk about the study of 2010?
① To point out the flaw of the study design with babies and a puppet show.
② To show that similar findings can be found about the natural good in humanity.
③ To compare the views of modern behavior psychologists with those of early philosophers.
④ To prove that none of the philosophers is right about humanity.
- 【1】 25. Whose view on human nature may the study in the second paragraph lend support to?
